Jordan Seiler

Civilian

Jordan Seiler operates around the premise that advertising pollutes and demeans our public spaces, by propagating a consumerist ideology that is harmful to individuals and our environment, while simultaneously eradicating the democratic conversations of civilians in favor of a homogenous corpo-political voice. The regime of order produced in the process fails to live up to our cities radical potential. His research, activism and artistic production go beyond aesthetics, exploring the infrastructures and mechanisms of advertising in the city. These strategies, street level interventions and the works he produces in the studio, are poetic forms of critical and at times reckless resistance.

PublicAccess: Functional key sculptures, 2015-ongoing (metal, rubber, dimensions variable)

Over more than 15 years, clear motivation has matured into an extremely social and often participatory form of practice. Part of this practice involves the production of resources, tools and the initiation of large-scale collaborations such as “NOAD” or “NYSAT”. The other, focuses on the creation of personal bodies of work, which explore the locations, materials and messages involved in the reclaiming of physical public space and the potential revealed by an absence of advertising. This duality is perhaps best articulated in his ongoing series of “PublicAccess” sculptures, which incidentally act as skeleton keys for most public advertising frames. While these are art objects and not intended for use, following their purchase, hundreds of buyers around the world have sent the artist images of their ad takeovers.

Public Access

Nearly every major metropolitan city has an active bus or trolley system. Over the years, this vital public service has become an integral part of the global outdoor advertising industry in the form of bus shelters and other municipal infrastructure. Chances are if a city has meaningful surface transit, a select few global outdoor advertising companies will operate public amenities like bus shelters, for which they have the sole right to display for profit commercial advertising.

This global corporate message stands against our public interest by distracting us from each other in favor of ourselves, invoking our desires to the detriment of our environment, and silencing our public voices by institutionalizing corporate visual expression in our shared public spaces. The PublicAccess project aims to reverse this one-way communication by providing access to municipal infrastructure for public dialogues. We hope you treat the key(s) you just received as functional sculptures and use them to take back your public space.

- PublicAccess keys are intended for bus shelters but may also work on other outdoor advertising furniture depending on the city.
- Locks are usually located on the lower right, or left hand side of the ad panel, and can be opened by turning the key until a latch releases and the door swings open. Don't be afraid to give it a jiggle if the door doesn't open immediately.
- We are looking to expand the online map of cities these keys can be used in. If you find your key works in a city that is not listed, please let us know.
- These keys are handmade. Please test them before your planned installation.
- If your key breaks due to normal use, please contact us and we will do our best to replace it.

His first solo exhibition at Harlan Levey Projects begins with images from Seiler's "Collisions" series, which was previously shown in "The Poster Remediated," curated by David Crowley (Head of Critical Writing in Art & Design at the Royal College of Art in London). In "Collisions," Seiler uses his own sculptures to replace advertisements with black and white posters reminiscent of op-art aesthetics, remaining at the scene of the crime to document his ephemeral interventions. The graphic images he places inside the frame demonstrate a desire to avoid exchanging one operative image with another, choosing instead for visually engaging signifiers that can be read by form, but not content. It is a style of work he began developing at the Rhode Island School of Design at the turn of the century.

At the center of the room, 115 industrial fluorescent lightbulbs continue to add light to image in a sculptural work that reveals a new direction in Seiler's practice. In this light sculpture, only 12 of the bulbs have been illuminated to provide a dim glow and 103 potential replacement bulbs for a work that will outlive print advertising in public places.

The collage “Titan Smash” shows the side of his practice that not only replaces advertisements (or assists others in doing so), but also removes the entire infrastructure of advertising. Made with plexiglass and stolen advertising signage, this work is reminiscent of his show “Removal Satisfies the Condition” (2006) where the artist showed contempt for public advertising by exhibiting a series of stolen telephone booths, billboards and other backdrops for urban ads; the beginning of a large salvaged archive of public artifacts. In the same straightforward manner as “Collisions,” “Titan Smash” literally refer to Seiler’s ongoing ad-busting performance and blatant disregard for corporate authority as remnants of advertisements are smashed to pieces over and over again.

The works from his newest series "Labor," are equally direct. In the back of the gallery, the noise of the city is replaced by the silence of the white cube as these works blend into the walls. Context, environment and the need for attention are stripped away in reductive illustrations that remove advertising first from public space and then of its own image. The result is minimal, and the effort to remove the advertisement immense. These are subtle works that are simultaneously obscure and heavy like the sense of civic duty Seiler employs in a generous approach to making art. The labor pieces are made by dressing up as a worker and driving around the city stealing advertising and the plexiglass that normally sits behind the ads to diffuse the backlighting that illuminates them at night. The advertisements are then taken into the studio where the text is painted out leaving only image. The plexi is then sanded down until it is cleaned of any blemishes and feels as close to a marble surface as possible. Each sanded piece is then layered on top of the ad until it is obscured to a point of satisfaction. Sometimes this makes it difficult to tell what you are looking at. The ghost ad images are tangible representations of the labor we all put in on a daily basis in the service of advertising and commercial media, consciously, but more often subconsciously.

A RISD graduate, Jordan Seiler is a New York-based artist and activist working with issues of advertising and collective agency in public space. Since the early 2000s, Seiler has coopted billboards and advertising spaces to display his own work, and has notoriously orchestrated large-scale 'takeovers' to draw attention to the overwhelming amount of advertising in public space as well as bring into question the ownership of that space. His work has been an inspiration for global activist projects like Art in Ad Places, Brandalism, No Ad Day, and included in exhibitions around the world such as the U.S. pavilion at the Venice Architecture Biennale, Austin Museum of Digital Art and International Poster Biennale in Warsaw.
